

From Liddell Hart to Joan Littlewood: Studies in British Military History

This volume brings together a selection of Brian Bonds most interesting contributions to books and journals on British military history in the 20th century. They are arranged around three large subjects: the First World War, the interwar decades, and the Second World War with concluding reflections on the authors Farewell to Arms at the end of a distinguished career in the Department of War Studies at Kings College, London. Brief new introductions have been written to provide background information and contexts for each essay. Sir Basil Liddell Harts name appropriately forms part of the titles since he was the authors original inspiration and mentor. His early career and influential publications on the First World War are critically discussed as is his later partnership with the reforming War Minister, Lesley Hore-Belisha. Professor Bond also acknowledges his tremendous debt to his research supervisor and founder of War Studies, Sir Michael Howard. Other essays provide fascinating examples of the authors main interests, including the Western Front and civil-military relations; the significance of post-1918 war memoirs; and the nadir of the Armys fortunes between the World Wars and its performance in France and Belgium in 1939-40. This section is complemented by case studies of Field Marshals Gort and Ironside. In recent years Professor Bond has been a leading critic of the Lions led by Donkeys school who have misrepresented and denigrated Britains achievement in the First World War. His target, the concluding essay in this volume, are the historical shortcomings of the stage and film version of Oh! What a lovely War - hence the inclusion of Joan Littlewoods name in the title. REVIEWS This is Brian Bond at his very impressive best. The essays in this book, written over a long and distinguished career, span Britains military contributions to the two great world wars of the 20th century, plus the critical inter-war period, and also how historians (and others!) have understood and interpreted these dramatic events ever since. Their range and quality reflect his place as one of the most important and influential British military historians, and the truth of his conviction that the study of war is essential to the understanding of British history. -Professor Stephen Badsey, University of Wolverhampton Generations of students of military history have benefited from Brian Bonds wise guidance in the Department of War Studies, Kings College London, in the British Commission for Military History, and through his extensive writings. As one of those matured students, I take a particular delight in seeing Brians writings collected together to remind us of the tremendous value of his contribution to our understanding of this endlessly fascinating subject.-- John Lee, British Commission for Military History

This splendid collection of essays, written over a span of some forty-seven years, confirms Brian Bond reputation as the pre-eminent British military historian of his generation. The fact that Professor Bond has consistently maintained his level of outstanding scholarship over such a long period commands ones profound respect, and all the essays in this volume remain not only relevant and thought-provoking but also highly readable.-- Professor Peter Simkins
The singular value of this volume is to make available writings otherwise difficult to find, even in this information age, or located in books (sometimes now very) expensive to buy or difficult to find unless one makes distinct effort. Although the Professor himself would not claim to be a sole voice, he has been one of the most influential interpreters and teachers of the history of the British Army in the modern era. This volume shows why. Society of Friends of the National Army Museum Newsletter
