

Observations on the Present Condition of the Island of Trinidad, and the Actual State Emancipation (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Observations on the Present Condition of the Island of Trinidad, and the Actual State Emancipation Seven years have now passed away since slavery was abolished throughout the British dominions by an Act of the Imperial Parliament; and three years have elapsed since the labouring population of the West Indies have been put into possession of social and political advantages, unexampled in extent at any period of history. Yet the question, Has the great experiment of negro emancipation succeeded? Is still asked, not merely by ordinary inquirers, but by philosophers and statesmen who have access to all printed documents, private or official, and whose chief business is investigation. It is impossible that doubts could exist with respect to important transactions in such near dependencies, where seventeen governors are writing and forwarding despatches by every packet, and from whence numerous public journals, hundreds of letters, and many ocular witnesses are continually arriving, unless the truth were obscured by the misrepresentations of party Spirit.
